To do this, you have to do two things. You have to create important legislative posts and, in the Legislature now, you have people serving, it is almost an assembly of unequals, in the sense that you have people who are serving who are a small body, whose votes are worth a lot and then you have people serving in a large body whose votes are relatively worth not too much.

A unicameral system would place everyone on an equal basis. It would, by reducing the size, it would create important positions which could be full time or largely full time, well paid, well staffed with legislative aides. In designing a unicameral system, I would say that 30 or 35 districts, with 2 representatives called assemblymen or senators for 8 districts, and I would consider the Oregon system of making each one a separate office, so that people would run for post No. 1, post No. 2 separately, rather than having the people who serve in that district run against one another. That is the system they use in Oregon now, in both the member districts.

I think that summarizes my thinking. I think
